A DELEGATE'S VIEWS.

A Chat with Evan Williams About the Chicago Convention.

Evan Williams, one of Ormsby's delegates to the Chicago Convention, was found on Monday in the Bullion Bank. As the writer entered he found Williams just finishing over $100 for some stock in Herman Springmeyer's artesian well project.

"If they get a big flow in Douglas it will spur Ormsby people up to this artesian well scheme. I have seen what a big thing it is in California, and why not here?"

"Yes, I had a good deal of pleasant experience in Chicago, and a good deal that was—well, just experience."

"Yes, hotel charges were at high water mark, and I had to pay $37.50 a day for my wife, and three children and myself. But I saw enough to realize that I was getting a sight at a big show at really low admission. It was worth $400 a day to see the big Convention in motion."

"No, the California delegation would unite with no one. It was, I think, a grave mistake, for with them and the Western States and Territories we could have swung about 80 votes, which would have been a big factor in the fight, and we would have had more weight."

"Yes, the California delegation killed Blaine, just as Bob Ingersoll's speech killed Gresham; but it is all over now, and the result is so satisfactory that no one has any right to kick. The strongest possible ticket has been nominated, and if you were in the East and could see that ticket grow like a well watered hop vine, you would have no doubt about the result."

"Yes, indeed, we stayed by Alger pretty well. He had about the heaviest personal following of anybody. The streets were filled with Alger men, and they were enthusiastic advocates. The only thing they urged against him was that Michigan was not a doubtful State, and that he had grown so enormously rich in the last few years that people would suspect that his riches had not come honestly. The Democrats, even in Michigan, however, all agree that he never owned a dollar that was not fairly acquired."

"The charge that he was buying Southern delegates was all nonsense. His managers had plenty of money and used it very liberally, but there was no crooked work, and no well informed men really believed there ever was an attempt at it. Alger would not accept a nomination under such circumstances."

"At the last the Convention felt that the nominees must come from doubtful States, and Indiana and New York loomed up as the ones. Harrison grows tremendously with the people everywhere; the more they know of him the better they like him. He is safe, honest and reliable, and he understands the wants of this Coast."

"I called at Morton's house in New York. I had always heard a good deal of talk about his being a purse-proud aristocrat, etc."

"Would you believe it? When I met his five daughters, who range in height from three feet to six, they were dressed in calico. I could not see that he was a man of much airs or fond of displaying his wealth."

"Yes, the New York Irish are for us strong. When the National Committee met we received assurances of support from many unexpected quarters."

"Humphries, of the American League, told me that they had 20,000 Irishmen on their club rolls in New York City, who had pledged themselves for Harrison, and that was soon after the nomination. He said the ranks swelled daily. The Irish are beginning to see the hand of England in this fight, and they are glad to have a chance to strike a blow against England. These 20,000 Irishmen all voted for Cleveland in 1884. There will be at least 50,000 New York Irishmen who will leave the Democratic party forever next November."

"The Democratic party is already on the run, and many are deserting it in the East to be on the winning side."

"There will be a solid North this year, and I am inclined to think also a broken South.

"The Southern delegates acted very considerately. They said: 'We are not here to dictate; let us know who you want and we are for him.'"

"No, neither Stewart nor Jones said a word on the floor of the Convention. All over the hall the young men did most of the talking, and the old heads sat back and worked in the night."

"A Democrat who was a delegate to St. Louis told me that he never saw such a representative body of Americans together as he saw at Chicago, and admitted the Democratic National Convention was tame in comparison."

"I do not state these things to brace any one up; I simply state things as I found them in the East."

Wanted to Get Married.

Yesterday an Italian named Pierini went to Justice Summerfield to get married. The Justice thought the girl looked rather young, and asked the man a few questions, which were answered all right, but the girl, who is but sixteen, called the Justice one side and told him she was too young, did not like the man, and did not want to get married, and so the Justice refused to perform the ceremony. They went to the different clergymen, who also refused. They then left for Virginia City. They hail from Dayton.
